Invasive weeds can alter an area by, among other things, disrupting the natural food web, promoting soil erosion, and interfering with natural plant succession. Rapid deforestation promptly followed by non-native weed infestation can quickly convert rare native forests into an impaired landscape. Direct control of weeds with mechanical, chemical, and biological control tac-tics have been applied in some areas in some years. Several larger areas burned in recent wildfires have been treated by aerially seeding with native grasses to quickly reestablish competitive native species. This has been proven to be very cost effective if done promptly after wildfires.
