I think it is reduced---- a matter of much importance in this disease, in which renal mischief so frequently occurs. And moreover I think that by administration of oxygen the febrile delirium is reduced, the restlessness of delirium in several cases having been replaced by sleep. Again, if M. Gautier be right, the noxious bodies found in pyrexia must be either eliminated or rendered inert by oxidation. M. Gautier thinks that they are largely oxidised in the blood. If so, a superoxygenated atmosphere would surely be of service, expediting such oxidation, and, other things being equal, relieving at least the eliminating organs. But are other things equal? It may be urged that oxygen, besides being essential for the patient, is helpful also to the virus; or that the more rapid oxidation of the noxious products above spoken of would afford a...
