It is the call of the rural problem to those who have heeded the call to rural life. Mrs. John Corbin, wife of the head of the wholesale house of Corbin Co., woolens, and whose home, The Rocks, had become one of the centres of Hillport s urban colony, was joyously stirred when she received this letter. She went everywhere among the summer residents creating interest in the service announced for the following Sunday morning. At one of the houses she visited, the daughter, Miss Janet Blake, was out and she was entertained by the father, Galusha Blake--if entertained is the word. For Old Man Blake, as he was called, was a soured and crotchety individual. Through the death of his wife some years before he had lost his faith--and consequently his health. He sold out his business interests in the city and withdrew from everything, and now rheumatism and crutches had completed the job. Mrs. Corbin mentioned to him the low standard of community life in Hillport, and asked if something couldn t be done to quicken the life of the town generally. Quicken that vegetative mass of humans! exclaimed Blake with a sneer. Dump them into the harbor--in some spot where the water is deep, you understand, so as not to obstruct navigation. And then populate the village with a new breed. That s the only way to quicken Hillport. But, Mr. Blake, I m in earnest....
