Excerpt: . . . to music under my Dispeopling scythe to slay, to bleed and die; And bards employ the magic of their lyre The thoughtless youth with fervor to inspire, For gory battles and the cannons fire, While you, my mates, are loathed by every worm, Not yours is pomp, nor pride nor uniform! He ended thus, and verified his boasts By hurling down a shoal of gloomy ghosts, Who, like a frightened flock of threatend sheep, Did huddle close, but yet seemed quite asleep, Unconscious of their state and of the place. They represented every soil and race And stood there bathed in blood, transpierced, all In arms, with gushing wounds that caused their fall. XVII. Now Plague with glance, which on frail mortals cast Doth freeze the blood and makes them breathe the last, A shower of pestiferous arrows spread, . As if once more...
