Green, of Missouri, on the Constitution of Kansas; Delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 16, 1857 The Senate having, on motion of Mr. Brown, resumed the consideration of the motion to print the President s message and accompanying documents - Mr. Green said: Mr. President, when, on Wednesday last, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] addressed the Senate, I was taken completely by surprise. I was surprised not only that he should have made his remarks at that time, but I was still more surprised at the manner and the matter of the speech. He himself stated, if I recollect correctly, that the President had made no recommendation on the subject of Kansas. It is a fact known by us all that no application on the part of Kansas was before Congress in any shape. If, therefore, there was neither an executive recommendation nor an application upon the part of Kansas, wherefore should the subject have been thrust on the attention of the country? When practical action is required on the part of Senators, the views of Senators are expected to be elicited; but when neither an executive recommendation required any practical action, nor any application on the part of Kansas had been made, it seemed to me most extraordinary that we should be compelled to engage in an abstract discussion with no reference to practical results. It is not my purpose to inquire into the motive of the honorable Senator. I am willing to concede, as I do, that it was patriotic; but I must think it very improper. It was well calculated to prejudice...
