Excerpt: . . . chancery sittings in Toronto, there was put in the witness box a gentleman of high standing in the community, though, like the worthy Zaccheus, little of stature. As he stood in the box, however, after being sworn, with arms outstretched along the top, and shoulders and head just visible, he presented to the Chancellors observant eye, as it first fell upon him, very much the appearance of some awkward fellow squeezed into a sitting position as comfortably as the straightness of the enclosure would allow; whereupon his lordship admonished the witness to stand up and give his evidence properly. But I am standing up, my lord, said the witness, with such solemnity as truth, spoken under oath, could alone give. An explanation of the true condition of affairs was then made sotto voce to the court, and the examination proceeded. A counterpart to this, is a story told of a diminutive barrister, temp. Lord Mansfield, named Morgan, who was so addicted to the citation of UrOkes Reports, that he won for himself the soubriquet of Frog Morgan--to which, probably, his squat figure gave additional point. Before he was much known at the bar, he was beginning to open a case, when Lord Mansfield, in a tone of grave rebuke, addressed him: Sir, it is usual for counsel, when they address the court, to stand up. I am standing, my Lord, screamed The Frog; I have been standing these five minutes. --Oanada Law Journal. --Early in...
